The Space to Be

Portrait photography often begins with a simple wish: to see a beautiful version of oneself. Yet the camera can turn self-expression into self-judgment.

I begin with conversation. Before each shoot, I listen to how each subject wants to be seen, then translate those expectations into styling, setting, and visual direction. During the session, I use imagination and gentle guidance rather than fixed poses.

By building trust around the image-making process, I aim to create portraits that hold both individuality and aspiration.

From Conversation to Character

A fashion-inspired portrait session

The subject wanted portraits that felt like a magazine editorial. I translated that aspiration into a visual direction and invited her to imagine herself as a professional model. Rather than prescribe every gesture, I guided the role and let her explore expressions and poses with greater confidence.

01 SUBJECT'S WISH

Fashion magazine-inspired portraits

02 CREATIVE DIRECTION

Editorial styling and role-based imagination

03 PHOTOGRAPHIC EXPRESSION

Gestures and expressions discovered through character

Building a Story Together

For the traditional costume portraits, I began by discussing each subject's preferences and expectations. Those conversations informed the costumes, props, and setting. During the shoot, I invited the subjects to inhabit a world inspired by the past, allowing gesture and expression to emerge through the imagined role.

COLLABORATIVE VISUAL DIRECTION

Costume, props, light, and spatial composition establish the atmosphere. The subject interprets the imagined role through her own gestures and expressions.
